M1 is useful for assaying for compounds that interact with mammalian (human, mouse, hamster, monkey or rabbit) PG, especially PG obtained from a multidrug-resistant cell line (e.g., multidrug resistant Chinese hamster ovary cell line CHRB30) or PG obtained from heterologous

(M1) is useful tor:

(a) determining if a compound is a good drug candidate;

(b) identifying compounds that are high affinity PG modulators;

(c) determining if a compound may be dangerous if used in combine.

The invention is used as vaccine. An antibody specific for the mutant P-glycoprotein is useful for determining whether a human tumour sample comprises tumour cells expressing mutant human P-glycoprotein. A recombinant expression construct comprising nucleic acid encoding mutant P-glycoprotein is useful for administering an increased amount of a chemotherapeutic agent to an individual with cancer, by transducing ex vivo haematopoietic cells from the individual with the recombinant

(I) is used to express recombinant proteins; its fragments are also useful as probes and primers for detection and amplification of related DNA. The protein produced, or cells expressing them, are used to determine if substances can inhibit, or avoid, MDR proteins, and in a screening method for identifying compounds that inhibit and in a screening method for identifying compounds that inhibit resistance protein MDR-1. MDR-1 is a transmembrane efflux pump, responsible for the export of drugs from certain cells, particularly cancer cells. Wild-type MDR-1 shows increased resistance to etoposide and decreased resistance to vinca alkaloids compared with a mutant form (AAY58187) where the Gly at position 185 is replaced by Val. Haematopoietic stem cells that express MDR-1 will be protected against chemotherapeutic agents, so can be engrafted while the patient is undergoing chemotherapy. Expansion of (rare) haematopoietic stem cells provides sufficient cells to permit standard biochemical analysis. Overexpression of MDR-1 allows cytokine-driven expansion of haematopoietic stem cells by at least 10-fold compared with a maximum

The modified haematopoietic stem cells are useful in bone marrow transplantation (to reconstitute haematopoietic systems in patients who have undergone chemotherapy radiation therapy) and in ex vivo gene therapy of genetic defects icells derived from haematopoietic stem cells, e.g., thalassaemia, gauchier's disease, sickle cell anaemia or leukaemia.                           The present invention relates to an isolated mutant human P-glycoprotein molecule. The invention is used as vaccine. An antibody specific for the mutant P-glycoprotein is useful for determining whether a human tumour sample comprises tumour cells expressing mutant human P-glycoprotein. A

The mutant P-glycoprotein is useful for treating and diagnosing cancer and for screening compounds for the capacity to disrupt binding of cytotoxic drugs with the mutant P-glycoprotein or to disrupt drug efflux from cells expressing the mutant P-glycoprotein. The present sequence is human wild type P-glycoprotein (wt P-gp).

The isolated stem cells may be used in the treatment of diseases such as muscular dystrophy, degenerative liver disorder, myocardial infarction, Parkinson's disease, degenerative disorders of the brain, and for the treatment of leukemia, and for expression or replacement. Haematopoletic cells can be used in bone marrow transplants (e.g., for treatment of leukemia) and for ex vivo gene therapy for treating blood diseases such as sixtle cell anemia and thalassemia. PGP, also known as multidrug transporter, MDR1 is a member of the ABC transporter superfamily. The enzyme serves as an efflux pump exporting small molecules across the cell membrane. The invention includes a cynomologous monkey (Macaca fascicularis) PGP coding sequence and protein, and also that of an allelic variant. The PGP polynucleotide sequence is useful for increasing PGP transporter activity in a cell. Antisense sequences of the cDNA are useful for inhibiting PGP transport activity in a mammalian cell. They may also be used for increasing the bioavailability of a drug. The present sequence represents the cynomologous monkey P-glycoprotein.

molecule. The invention is used as vaccine. An antibody specific for the cumulant P-glycoprotein is useful for determining whether a human tumour sample comprises tumour cells expressing mutant human P-glycoprotein. A recombinant expression construct comprising nucleic acid encoding mutant P-glycoprotein is useful for administering an increased amount of a chemotherapeutic agent to an individual with cancer, by transducing ex vivo haematopoietic cells from the individual with the recombinant expression construct, reintroducing the transduced haematopoietic cells into the individual and administering an increased amount of a chemotherapeutic agent without consequent haematopoietic cyctotoxicity. The mutant P-glycoprotein is useful for treating and diagnosing cancer and for screening compounds for the capacity to disrupt binding of cytotoxic drugs with the mutant P-glycoprotein or to disrupt drug efflux from cells expressing the mutant P-glycoprotein. The present sequence is human P-glycoprotein (P-gp) mutant, MDRI-E643K/E647K/E652K (8-84) The present (multidrug resistance). invention relates to an isolated mutant human P-glycoprotein body specific for the
